I want to select dates like "2015-01-01,2015-01-02..." function selectDates() { $(tr).click(function () { var startDate = $("#txtDate1").val(); var endDate = $("#txtDate2").val(); var allDates = [startDate,endDate]; $("#mytable").jqGrid('setSelection', allDates); }); } A: If you use date formatter and then format string which could be 'YYYY-MM-DD' for both txtDate1 and txtDate2 in grid then jqGrid will format dates in the selected rows (see here for details) and the selected dates will be added to the array. One more option would be to define start and end dates in the form like '2015-01-01,2015-01-02,2015-01-03' (see here for details). The date formatting function which format the date will in this case return an array like ['2015', '01', '02'] which would be transformed to the array with the start and end dates. Then you can just setSelection to this array and jqGrid will do the rest. You can also use the selection option of jqGrid to select multiple dates. The only problem with this option is that you have to use absolute date format for the date. Thus you will have to know the exact date format which jqGrid uses internally to parse the date. If you use relative date formats you will have to build the array of dates using string concatenation. .get_network_by_uid(uuid) assert not net_id

This specification relates to conversion of data between network file systems and storage systems. As the volume of data that users and organizations generate, create, store, process, and analyze grows, the demand for data storage systems that can meet these demands increases. Typically, large-scale data storage systems are deployed in data centers and storage areas that provide a physical location to store large amounts of data for various organizations. In many cases, the data centers are responsible for ensuring the data storage systems within the data center operate efficiently. Data storage systems may be expanded or contracted to meet the needs of the organization. Electronic devices such as smartphones and personal computers (PCs) have conventionally used liquid crystal displays (LCDs) as their display devices. In addition, in recent years, attention has been focused on organic EL displays, which have features of high visibility, such as no need of backlights as in the liquid crystal displays, low power consumption, and thinness, and have attracted attention as the next-generation display devices. Japanese Patent Application Publication No. 2008-304994 (Patent Document 1), for example, discloses a display device including a pair of substrates and a light-emitting element layer, formed between the pair of substrates, including a layer of an electron-transporting compound, a layer of a first light-emitting layer, and a layer of a second light-emitting layer. With such a structure, a light-emitting layer is provided on one of the pair of substrates, and a hole-transporting compound layer is provided on the other of the pair of substrates. Also, a hole-injecting electrode is provided on the hole-transporting compound layer, an electron-injecting electrode is provided on the electron-transporting compound layer, and a cathode is provided on the electron-injecting electrode. Also, the hole-inject 3e33713323
