Description of the Prior Art Beam gating is widely used in X-ray CT and other systems to attenuate the primary radiation beam in order to obtain a desired image. Typically, such a beam gating is achieved by forming a slit in a window material. The slit controls the amount of beam that passes through the window material, thereby attenuating the beam. Generally, the slit is formed by placing a slit member inside the window material and attaching the slit member to the window material. However, because the slit may be a pressure sensitive material, it is desirable to attach the slit member to the window material in a manner that allows for longitudinal movement of the slit member (that is, slits whose width changes along their length so that there is always a slit opening). A known method for attaching the slit to the window material includes placing a gasket in a slit formed in the window material and sealing the slit with a gasket sealant. A problem with this method is that the size of the gasket is limited to the size of the window material. As a result, only a relatively small slit may be formed in the window material because the slit must be limited in width.
