It was first established by Finnish cinematographer and photographer Ragnar Krukoff, who is credited with capturing the digital era's first HDR image in 1987, and first became commercially available as a consumer product in 1995, when Kodak developed Kodak Professional Portra 160 Color Negative Film. HDR results in pictures that show significantly increased highlight detail and shadow detail compared to traditional (single exposure) photographs. HDR photography has become increasingly popular and today it is also used in many different applications, from televisions to billboards, and from scientific and medical imaging to space photography. HDR photography is often used in computer games to give environment lighting a realistic look. HDR technology and applications used in other image producing industries continues to develop. Recently HDR photos have been released commercially from the professional photography market. The first was taken by Manuel Londry (an American cinematographer) with Canon's EOS 5D Mark II camera, combining a series of eight different exposures of the same scene taken at different exposures, merged using software to produce the final image. HDR technology also can be used as an educational tool in the classroom. The release of Panavision's Panavision Hypercam, an HD video camera capable of capturing high-dynamic-range images, has made it easier for both teachers and students to create high dynamic range imaging for any subject, allowing students and teachers to explore the HDR imaging field with greater ease and with more flexibility than ever before. Commercially available HDR digital cameras, such as the Kodak Gigapixel Camera, the Sanyo Xacti HD10 Gigapixel, the Fujifilm FinePix S10 Pro, as well as the Blackmagic Design
