It was signed September 14, 1797 at Fort Mifflin in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania by chief Benjamin Tasker, "father of the Shawnee", and other Native American representatives, including the Delaware, Wyandotte, Lenape, Shawnee, Wyohomish, Potawatomi, and Miami. It resulted from the Treaty of Paris (1783) that concluded the Revolutionary War.

Background The First Continental Congress passed the Indian Intercourse Act on July 14, 1775 to regulate commerce and trade with the Indian Tribes. The law was designed to meet the special circumstances of the Revolutionary War, where the American and the British troops were fighting the Europeans on their own land, and the British were also selling land to the Indian Nations. Since the British and the American would not allow the French (who were supporting the colonists) to trade with the Indian Nations, the Continental Congress wanted the Indians to trade with the British and Americans if they were willing to support the French. To help the American side achieve that goal, the Continental Congress passed a series of laws on Indian trade and commerce. The first Continental Congress passed the Indian Intercourse Act in 1776. It provided that the tribe either had to sign a treaty guaranteeing to "obey and support" the United States or sell their land to the United States. The Indian Intercourse Act also prohibited the states from selling the land to foreign nations. The Indian Intercourse Act was signed into law by the U.S. President John Jay on September 7, 1783. The Treaty of Paris concluded the Revolutionary War and it had as one of its terms, the Indian Intercourse Act of 1776. The Act, which became effective September 7, 1783 and provided for the payment of $6,000,000 (equivalent to $ today) to the Indian Nations, was extremely unpopular with the United States because it benefited the British (who were the "enemy") instead of the United States (who were the "friends"), and it effectively cut off land sales to the United States. To restore the land sales, Benjamin Franklin, the American diplomat who helped negotiate the treaty, proposed two other peace treaties with the Indians.

California, a state dominated by climate change awareness, has taken further efforts to follow in the footsteps of its two fellow West Coast states, Oregon and Washington, and make its land use decisions more in line with the realities of the changing climate. Last week, the California legislature passed Bill 109, requiring the state to make more renewable energy available to its residents, make its buildings more energy efficient, and help finance the transition to 100 percent renewable energy, among other actions. Its effect could reach as far as Colorado, Arizona and Nevada. The bill's primary tenets are Siting and Permitting of Renewables and Other Green Energy Projects (SAG) for private sector investment, a 90 percent renewable energy goal by 2030, and investments of $50 billion by 2020 to develop clean energy sources. The bill also establishes a $1.3 billion incentive program to build solar panels on residential rooftops, and requires local governments to develop policies to encourage living in a sustainable manner. This year, cities and counties in California have passed more than 80 policies in support of the bill's initiatives. While other bills have been passed prior, this is the first major legislative push to set goals for the entire state. California's huge support for renewable energy has often been credited to Governor Arnold Schwarzenegger, f30f4ceada
