Outcome was reviewed in 30 patients who underwent distal bypass to the deep femoral artery (DFA) using the internal jugular vein. All patients were seen postoperatively for assessment of patency and clinical status. Venous graft patency and limb salvage were 100% at 12 months. Postoperative morbidity included 12 wound complications and one myocardial infarction. We conclude that graft patency and limb salvage are equivalent to those of autologous veins, and morbidity may be decreased with the use of the internal jugular vein.Modeling approaches and early drug treatment in children with severe respiratory syncytial virus infection. In this review, we describe recent results from both clinical and modeling studies with the goal of providing a framework for considering the potential benefits of preventing severe respiratory syncytial virus (RSV) disease. RSV infection is the leading cause of hospitalization in infants younger than 1 year of age worldwide. Despite the use of an effective, relatively safe, and inexpensive vaccine, studies have demonstrated only limited protection against RSV-induced severe disease, particularly among young children and those with pulmonary disease. One interpretation of these results is that infants have evolved a protective immune response to RSV early in life, yet at the same time have evolved a susceptibility to severe disease if it is triggered by immune system malfunction. Recent modeling studies demonstrate that two mechanisms can account for the partial protection observed with current vaccines: either the presence of immune-enhancing factors, or an immune system able to better detect the presence of RSV and mount a protective response but which does so in a suboptimal
